When I first met Max de Winter, he was brooding bitterly over the death of his beautiful wife, Rebecca, in a strange accident; my own shy ways and my hidden love for him—made him gay and happy. He asked me to marry him, and we went to Manderley, his famous estate. Everything about the great house bore Rebecca's influence, and Mrs. Danvers, the housekeeper, seemed to resent my taking Rebecca's place as the mistress of Manderley. Surprisingly, she suggested a costume for me, for the Manderley Masquerade Ball; but when I appeared in it, Max furiously sent me upstairs to change. Mrs. Danvers waited there, smiling, to tell me it was the same costume Rebecca had worn! Suddenly there was commotion outside, a ship had gone ashore, and a diver had discovered Rebecca's sailing boat.

Chapter Five I stumbled across the beach, looking for Maxim. I found him in Rebecca's cottage. When I saw him, he was standing near the strangely blazing fireplace, disheveled, his evening clothes of the night before stained with sea water. His face seemed blank, yet ravaged with the look of a man who could not bear to see more. "Maxim!" I called. "Maxim—you haven't had any sleep." He turned to me, and with a strange tenseness drew me close. "You've forgiven me, haven't you?" I said. "Forgive you? What have I got to forgive you for?" "The last night of my stupidity about the costume." "Oh, that! I was angry with you, wasn't I?"

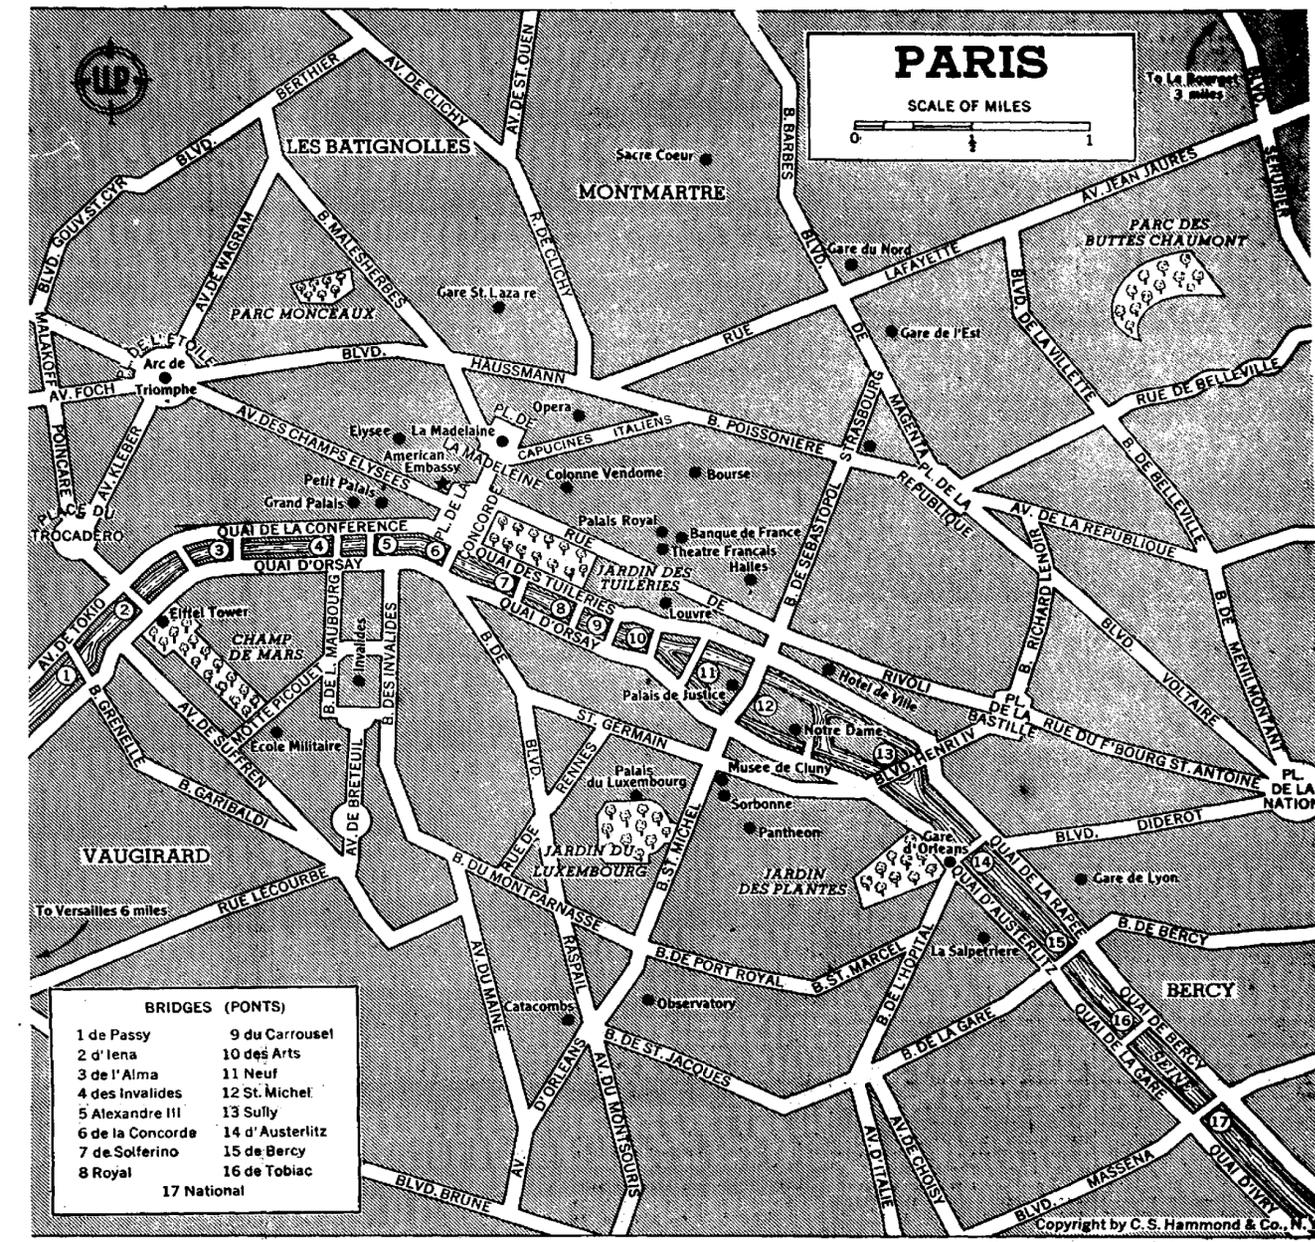

"No! No!" I exclaimed. "She hasn't won! She hasn't..." "Yes," I whispered. "Oh, Maxim, can't we start all over again?" I burst out. "I don't ask that you love me... I won't ask impossible things. I'll be your friend and companion... I'll be happy with that." He took my face in his hands. "How much do you love me?" he asked, his voice tortured by something I did not know. "Maxim, must I tell you...?" "I'm afraid it's too late, my darling," he said slowly, "it's all over now. The thing's happened—the thing I've dreaded."

"Rebecca has won." I could only think of his love for her, of how I had lost. "Her shadow has been between us all the time," he went on. "She knew that this would happen." "What are you saying?" "I found another boat..." "I know, Frank told me. Rebecca's boat..." "The diver made another discovery. He broke one of the ports and looked in. There was a body in there—Rebecca's." "The woman that was washed up at Edgewcombe—that was Rebecca. It was the body of some unknown woman. I identified it, but I knew it was not Rebecca. It was all a lie. I knew where Rebecca's body was! Lying on that cabin floor, on the bottom of the sea." "How did you know, Maxim?" "He turned to face me. "Because I put it there!" He stepped nearer me. "Will you look into my eyes and tell me that you love me now?" he said bitterly. "You see—it's too late."

At the inquest, Mr. Tabb, the local butcher, pointed out that the sea cocks had been opened, and that this could not have been an accident. The coroner called Maxim to the stand. "You must understand," he said, "that this new evidence raises the possibility that Mrs. de Winter may have taken her own life. Painfully, I must ask you, were there any relations between you and the late Mrs. de Winter perfectly happy?" The words began to buzz in my ears. The courtroom, the myriad of shapes, whirled wildly. I fainted.
