Livestock Buyers Must Keep Record of Deals

One of the new state laws which is of interest to livestock buyers, which went into effect on July 4, provides that "any person or corporation engaged in the business of buying livestock for the market, or for slaughter, shall keep such records regarding time of purchase, name and residence of seller and description of the livestock purchased as may be determined by the department of agriculture." It further provides that such records shall be open to inspection of peace officers at reasonable times. It also provides that a failure to keep such a record or refusing to offer the same for inspection when requested shall constitute a misdemeanor and punishable by a fine of not exceeding $100.
A form has been furnished to the local sheriff from the department of agriculture which outlines the information required and states that while the form of the record is left optional the information must be kept in a permanent record by all buyers of livestock for market or slaughter.
The information outlined on the form furnished includes date of purchase, name of hauler, address of hauler, owner of livestock purchased, kind of vehicle used in transporting, license number if truck or auto, license number of trailer if used, kind of animals, number of animals, breed or color of animals, weight of animals and signature line for buyer's signature.

Knowing How

The accumulation of 27 years of experience in funeral directing—possibly as much as anything—is responsible for the consistent preference shown for Berg Service.
Patrons sense this "knowing how" in countless different ways—in the careful attention to details, in the orderliness and precision with which the service moves forward, and in the deft competence of attendants.
