White Orchids
By MARIE BLIZARD

READ THIS FIRST:
Phil Farris, New York reporter, is old-fashioned enough to believe that his wife's place is in the home with their new-born baby, Jessica, Eleanor, who met Phil on a small-town newspaper, and aspirations to do some kind of writing and supplement Phil's modest salary. Phil has a talk with Kate Douglas, society editor of his paper, who let Eleanor assist her for a few weeks before the baby was born.

CHAPTER SEVENTEEN
AUTUMN CAME and went swiftly on the wings of work. Eleanor greeted the mornings joyfully. She lived those days for the long, quiet evenings when, with Jessica asleep and Phil at work, she sat down at the typewriter and lost herself in the making of her novel.

Gone was her desire to be part of an office force. She had a new world peopled with characters of her own creation. They belonged to her alone.
She did not tell Phil that she was writing.

Nor did she allow it to have any part of her domestic life. Born to organize, she divided her life into a pattern; part of it—the days—belonged to Phil and the baby. Those hours she spent cleaning, laundering for her family, cooking and caring for the baby. The rest of her time was her precious own.

Phil's night off was Wednesday, and on Wednesday evening, leaving Jessica in the care of the youngest Petrella girl, the Parishes set forth on the excursions a limited purse permitted. They dined out in cheap restaurants and went to the theater or to the movies on passes Phil got from the office. Sometimes they went to art exhibits or outdoor concerts. They saw little of the old crowd since they could no longer afford to return hospitality.

Mr. Shannon was excited and happy. There was a vividness about her that her husband saw with relief and did not question its source. It was enough for her that she had an absorption. She had no plans beyond the writing of the book. Whether it was good enough for publication, she had no idea or little interest at that point. Perhaps, she thought vaguely, when it was finished as she wanted it to be, she would show it to a publisher. Later, perhaps, she would tell Phil about it.

Back of the secrecy which she maintained were two motives: her own desire to keep it for her own, and a quality in her love for her husband that wanted to spare him from the unhappiness she knew he would feel—that any man would feel—discovering that his wife had done what he had always said he would do.

She couldn't remember when they had stopped talking about the novel that Phil was going to write. Yet, somehow she knew that they had both wordlessly accepted his abandonment, when he had been put on the night shift at the office. Her pity for him then was stronger than her wish to make him apply himself to something else.

She told herself that when he got back to a daytime job, she would try to interest him again in the forgotten work.
Phil came home triumphant one March morning and awakened her to tell her that Abrams had put him back on the old beat.

Eleanor was happy and joyful for him. She rejoiced with him. But lying awake, long after he had gone to sleep, she thought of the adjustment she would have to make in her own program.
"Strident Symphony" was nearly finished, but there were many changes that she wanted to make. And she knew now that when it was finished, another story, already taking form in her mind, was clamoring for her expression. What time would she have to work on it?

She would find time. She must find a way to have free evenings! "Want to go to the bouts at the Garden?" Phil asked her one night.
"Why don't you go with the boys?" she answered.

She encouraged him to play bridge with "the boys."
That was one of the ways that she hoarded evenings for herself.
Later there were times when he'd ring her from the office and ask her to meet him. "The gang's going over to the Weida's, baby. Leave Jessica with Louisa and come and meet me."

"Would you mind going without me, Phil? There are . . . some things . . . I'd like to get done tonight. Run along and have a good time."
At first Phil had protested. In time he accepted her suggestions. It had been almost a year since he had had any good times. He was like a boy out of school.

Eleanor was eager to hear about those good times, but her interest was objective and not subjective. She indicated no desire to take part in them.
Eleanor had other interests, interests that she would have shunned a year before. She had taken to calling on her neighbors.

She had developed a searching sympathy for their stories. She talked to the mothers, the wives and the romantic girls to whom she once would have only bowed. She discussed recipes and clothes and husbands, not her own, with the Rosenbergs, the Petrellas and the Kellys.

It was May when she made the last correction on her typed script. Then she was eager to do something with it. But she put it away in a big manila envelope, disciplining herself to wait until a little time had passed. Later, when the story was not so fresh in her mind, she would take it out and look at it critically. Then, if it pleased her, would be time enough to do something about it.

The other story, as yet untitled, tempted her. But she would not start it until her mind was clear of the last.
She felt empty when she put the story on the shelf in her clothes closet. She had boundless energy and nothing to do with it. She was keyed to a tension that had no outlet.

"Don't you think it's about time we had a party?" she said to Phil one May night. "It seems like years since we've had one."
Phil didn't answer at once. He was thinking of the shabbiness of the apartment, and that once Eleanor would have refused to entertain any such idea for that reason.
"It would be fun to see the old gang," she added.
